

Lori Aratani, Transporter Reporter, The Washington Post

Lori Aratani is a transportation reporter at The Washington Post whose beat includes airlines, airports and the agencies that oversee them. Most recently, she written about the impact the global pandemic has had on the aviation sector and how that may change air travel in the future. She also writes about innovation in the transportation sector and how new technology is changing how people get where they're going. Previously, she was a reporter with the San Jose Mercury News. She grew up in California and graduated from Boston University, where she learned the real meaning of cold weather.